Bronchial responsiveness to histamine in asthmatic subjects. In order to clarify whether non-specific airway hyperresponsiveness (AHR) is present in asthmatic subjects and whether airway responsiveness is related to airway inflammation in bronchial asthma, we measured the responsiveness to histamine (100 micrograms per subject) by use of a specific inhalation challenge system (S.I.C.S.). Twenty-one patients with bronchial asthma and 10 normal subjects participated in this study. All subjects underwent skin tests with a battery of various allergens. The present study showed that 23% (5 of 21) of asthmatic patients, but none (0 of 10) of normal subjects, had a decrease in the forced expiratory volume in 1 second (FEV1) of 20% or more after inhalation of histamine, indicating airway hyperresponsiveness in these patients. In asthmatic patients, a significantly larger decrease in FEV1 after the inhalation of histamine was observed in patients with a positive skin test to at least one of the test allergens (p less than 0.01), compared to those with a negative skin test. In addition, the asthmatic patients with a positive skin test showed a significantly larger change in the airway resistance (Raw) after the inhalation of histamine than those with a negative skin test (p less than 0.05). The intraglottic pressure (Pti) and lung volume (Vt) at the time of the maximum response to histamine were significantly increased in the asthmatic patients with a positive skin test compared with those with a negative skin test (p less than 0.05 and p less than 0.05). The results of skin tests and the measurements of airway responsiveness to histamine did not correlate with airway inflammation as evaluated by bronchoalveolar lavage, as measured by the number of eosinophils and neutrophils. These findings suggest that non-specific airway responsiveness to histamine may be present in asthmatic patients and that it may be associated with their allergic status.// Copyright (c) Microsoft.
