Photoshop Elements is a convenient Photoshop-like program for beginner and amateur users. However, it's limited in its editing capabilities (covered in the next chapter) and doesn't have many, if any, presets. The free version of Photoshop Elements includes only two layers, 1-point selection, spot healing, and a basic curve. It also doesn't have a crop tool, brush selection, and several color adjustment controls. The paid version has a large number of control adjustments and a crop tool. Most of the time, you'll find that the free version is good enough for what you need and you can upgrade to the $79.95 version at any time. For more information, check out Chapter 18. Photoshop Express is another free Windows-based image editing program. The program lets you perform many advanced editing functions, including edit multiple layers and apply any adjustments. Unlike Photoshop, though, you can't directly edit the pixels, so you can't crop and draw directly on images in Express. You can see an image in the main editing window, but you can't see the pixels underneath. However, you can scale, flip, and rotate the image. You can also copy and paste the pixels of an image between two Open dialog boxes. You can add any effects you want (as long as you're using the default settings), but you can't create layers like you do in Photoshop. You can also view histograms and presets. The one advantage you get with Express over Photoshop is that you can save and use a preset. Use the current version of Express when you first start a new document. The Photoshop Express version 2.0 is the current version at the time this book was written. Effect of paracetamol and phenylephrine on renal haemodynamics and renin release in man. In 8 healthy subjects paracetamol (15-30 mg/kg b.w.) alone did not affect the haemodynamics or the release of immunoreactive renin. In contrast, when it was administered together with the alpha-adrenergic agonist phenylephrine (1.25-2.5 mg), the diuretic and natriuretic effects could be obtained at significantly lower doses. The decrease in total peripheral resistance was, however, proportionally related to the rise in blood pressure and pulse, suggesting vasodilatation due to a combination of a direct effect of the drug on the vasculature and of the increase in blood flow. The ability to elicit haemodynamic responses by smaller doses of paracetamol in combination with phenylephrine indicates that these drugs may not necessarily be excreted renally. Striatal afferents to the interpeduncular nucleus: a histochemical study in the rat. Injections of either 1 microliter 6% carbogen (pulse of 100% O₂) or 3% (O₂) into the interpeduncular nucleus (IPN) of the rat at bregma 1.2 mm caused a significant reduction in the retrograde transport of horseradish peroxidase (HRP) from the ipsilateral superior colliculus (SC). The results were also quantified by means of a densitometric analysis of the graphs obtained in these HRP-injected animals. The amount of retrogradely transported HRP in the SC was reduced by 64-67% after carbogen injections. Decreases in the extent of transport in animals exposed to O₂ were 44-50%. Both carbogen and O₂ caused a significant reduction in the extent of the dopaminergic (DA) terminals within the SC. These results demonstrate that in the rat, carbogen and O₂ applied within the IPN modulate the activity of striatal afferents to the same extent. Furthermore, the reduction in the quantity of this transport was correlated with a marked decrease in the number of dopaminergic terminals of the SC. Inhibitory effect of pemafibrate, a novel peroxisome proliferator-activated receptor-alpha and -gamma agonist, on leptin-induced proliferation of adipocytes. Leptin, a 16 kDa protein secreted

Immunocytochemical localization of factor VIIc (a serine protease) in normal and neoplastic tissues. Antibodies to factor VIIc, a component of the intrinsic factor X/VII complex, were used to detect factor VIIc in frozen tissue sections of normal human tissues and tumours by immunocytochemical staining. Factor VIIc was detected exclusively in hematopoietic tissues, including megakaryocytes, platelets, megakaryoblasts, erythroblasts, granulocytes and monocytes. Its distribution within the cells was similar to that of factor VII antigen. It was detected in the plasma membrane of all hematopoietic cells but, additionally, in the cytoplasm and nucleus of some cells in the spleen, bone marrow, lung and placenta, where it was predominantly found in the cytoplasm of cells of the monocytic lineage. The antibody to factor VIIc stained all epithelial tissues, including bronchial, pulmonary, glandular and renal tissues, and tumours derived from these tissues. Factor VIIc was specifically expressed in the cytoplasm of epithelial cells but was also found on the surface of tumour cells. Factor VIIc was detected in various cell types within tumours derived from tissues which expressed factor VIIc in the normal tissue, e.g. choriocarcinoma. Factor VIIc was not found in bone marrow cells, endothelial cells or lymphocytes. Membrane fuel cells provide power to many portable electronic devices. Conventional membrane fuel cells include an anode, a cathode, and a membrane. The membrane and cathode are immersed in a fluid electrolyte, and the anode is immersed in a gaseous fuel. Each of these components is contained in a separate housing. The fuel and oxidant gases are supplied to the fuel cell and conducted to the anode and cathode, respectively, via internal manifolds disposed in the housings. A disadvantage of current designs is that fuel cells use and consume an auxiliary electrolyte. The auxiliary electrolyte is required to electrically connect the anode and cathode to one another and also to conduct the passage of the fuel and oxidant gases to and away from the anode and cathode, respectively. Without the electrolyte, the anode and cathode do not connect to one another, and thus, the fuel and oxidant gases cannot be transported between the anode and cathode
