It was a DOS application, had a tiny footprint, and was priced at $995. The first version was much more simple than today's AutoCAD applications, so it was often referred to as "pencil & paper CAD". With the release of the 1982 version, Autodesk introduced a "portable" license, in which an unlimited number of computers could be licensed to use the software for free. The official portable license allowed 30 users to work concurrently, and there was no time limit on its use. The user interface was typical of 1980s software at the time: a small icon display, and prompts to be entered by the operator. The keyboard or mouse was used to move the cursor. No pull-down menus were available at the time. The first full-fledged AutoCAD version was 2.1, released in 1985. Version 2.1 featured improved floating windows, an infinite workspace, and version numbering. The 1986 version added NURBS, and the 1987 version added 2D drawing and 3D modeling features. The 1988 version

(AutoCAD 3) incorporated 3D (3-dimensional) features, such as extruded surfaces, and the 1989 version (AutoCAD 4) introduced shape blending (altering the properties of one shape and its contents to another shape, or its contents). Over the next few years, the resolution was improved to at least 300 dpi. The 1990 version included a task-oriented interface with pull-down menus, document properties, and the ability to print and copy. The 1992 version was the first to use AutoCAD 2000. This was a scaled-down version of AutoCAD 4.0 with a new user interface and drawing methods. The user could not select objects, and for the first

Induction of rat hepatic P-450 enzymes by single oral administration of the new imidazole-dithiocarbamate derivative, ethyl 2-[5-[2,2-dimethyl-4-[methylcarbonyl-2-methyl-2-(4-methyl-5-thiazolyl)imidazolylmethylthio]-2-hydroxy-2-oxoethoxy]imidazol-1-yl]ethyl carbonate (AS1903278). A new imidazole-dithiocarbamate derivative, AS1903278, was found to be a strong inducer of hepatic ethoxyresorufin-O-deethylase (EROD) activity in rats. AS1903278 was given orally to male Wistar rats for 7 days at dose levels of 0.03-10 mg/kg. The induction levels of hepatic EROD activities in animals given 3, 10 and 30 mg/kg were two, five and seven times higher than those of control animals, respectively. AS1903278 also induced hepatic 7-ethoxycoumarin-O-deethylase (ECOD) and 7-pentoxoresorufin-O-depenthylase (PROD) activities. The induction of EROD activities in the liver was dose-dependent and statistically significant in all dosed groups compared with control animals (P < Q: If Tridion workflow emails the content to a non-existent record, how do I change that? So, we have a workflow that is being triggered on a component saving, and it sends the content to an external system for approval. The workflow is not dependent on a "Record" object in the code - it just uses the "Sender" record of the sender account. If the content is created, and the external system doesn't approve it, how can I make the workflow "think" it had been approved 5b5f913d15
