Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to a process and apparatus for shaping wire and, more particularly, to the use of suction applied to the outer surface of a wire, particularly a wire drawn from a drawing furnace, to shape the outer surface of the wire.
2. Background Description Wire drawing operations have evolved into very large scale units where continuous high strength, high tensile steel wire is produced from molten metal contained in a furnace. The steel wire is formed by drawing the molten steel from the furnace into a trough wherein the molten steel is discharged onto a rotating quench roll or annealing roll. As the steel wire leaves the quench roll or annealing roll, it is sent through a pair of guides that have been positioned a predetermined distance from the quench or annealing rolls and are immersed into a cooling tower that contains a medium that quenches and solidifies the wire. The cooling tower is generally cylindrical and has an inner diameter that is slightly larger than the diameter of the steel wire that is produced. A circumferential groove is generally formed in the cooling tower to decrease the height of the cooling tower which allows the diameter of the cooling tower to be smaller than that of the quenching and annealing rolls. The steel wire is usually processed while it is still molten in the furnace or after it is first drawn from the furnace. Steel wire that is drawn from the furnace is commonly referred to as cold-chamber wire or as hot-chamber wire.
