Description of the Related Art Among the techniques for analyzing acquired images and detecting abnormal patterns is a technique known as "principle component analysis (PCA)", "linear discriminant analysis (LDA)", and "principle component regression (PCR)". PCA is a technique in which an input image is converted by an eigenvector (matrix) to be outputted in order to find an eigenvector having a large eigenvalue among eigenvectors representing variances of the input image. LDA is a technique in which principal component is found from an input image, and a discrimination plane is established on the basis of the principal component. PCA is effective in that it can be applied to input patterns of any dimension, and that it is very effective in a pattern input of a small number of dimensions compared with a huge dimension. For example, PCA is disclosed in Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 7-250393. LDA is effective in that the output is independent of a dimension of the input pattern. For example, LDA is disclosed in Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 8-245410. PCR is effective in that it can detect an abnormal pattern in any dimension in a similar manner to LDA. Consequently, where detection of an abnormal pattern, e.g., a cancer cell, is performed on the basis of an image obtained by imaging a subject such as a tumor or the like, LDA or PCR is effective. On the other hand, normal cells, e.g., skin cells or normal cells
