ESCs can be cultured indefinitely in vitro and can differentiate into almost any kind of cells. Upon differentiation, ESCs typically exhibit a more stable and uniform expression pattern of a specific set of genes than that of the undifferentiated cells. The use of mouse ESCs as donor cells has produced many novel insights into the regulation of pluripotency and differentiation in mammals and has developed the use of ESCs for therapeutic applications in regenerative medicine. In particular, mouse ESCs have been widely used for the production of chimeras, in which the chimera is created by injecting the ESCs into an embryo together with a single cell from a different blastocyst, resulting in the production of a chimeric animal (creating a novel individual) containing two genetically different populations of cells derived from the original blastocyst
