To get a bit better of an idea what the process of editing would look like, have a look at Figure 2-4. FIGURE 2-4: Photoshop isn't just for photo manipulation; you can edit images in other ways as well. What makes Photoshop different from other image editing programs is that the editing is done with layers. This concept can seem like a bit of a jumble when you first start, but the idea is that a photo is broken into bits, or layers, called pixels. Photoshop holds the original image in a separate layer. You then build a new layer on top of the original. Each layer is then shown as a transparent panel that you can manipulate.

Editing text with Photoshop Photoshop's text editing capabilities are robust. You can add text with color, size, alignment, placement, and opacity; you can apply a bevel and emboss; and you can even create text effects such as drop shadows and reflections. The main problem with it is that you sometimes need to create your own font or have the text already stored on your computer to use it. Whether you are creating text or drawing new objects, the first thing you need to do is type the text into the canvas. Text is added in much the same way you would add a photo, by placing the text cursor over the area where you want to place the text, clicking the Type button, and typing. When you first type text, Photoshop adds a bit of space around the text, so you end up with this type of look. To get rid of that space, you select the text by clicking the text cursor and then press the Delete key. Photoshop smartly recognizes that the text was added and rids the area of it. You don't really need to worry about the spacing, however; you just choose from a pop-up menu that appears when you click and drag to change the size of the text. You can add multiple fonts and font collections in Photoshop, and if you want to store multiple collections on your computer, you can create and save them for later use. For more information on fonts, click the Help button to access the Photoshop Help Center. There are many other ways to create text. Here are a few: To create text manually, you can move the text cursor over the canvas where you want to place the text and then draw a box of the size you want the text to be. To create text

Q: When using a Facebook App for authentication do I still need a custom hostname? My business registration is handled with Office365 and I use a custom domain for it. I also have an application I use for user authentication and promotion and I have customized it with the Firefox Scriptor using the example provided by Facebook. In the example Facebook provides a hostname for the application like: When I develop an app within Facebook I can get that hostname by editing the App settings within the Facebook Apps (dev environment). But the Facebook documentation states that I need a custom hostname for production. Why is this? Shouldn't I be able to use the App itself? A: I believe you're right, it should use the app itself for development, and not take the custom hostname from the Facebook app. Have you tried re-composing the custom hostname? (eg: `example.com/gcl_source/fb_app_id/id`) Facebook have also confirmed that they don't use a custom hostname for staging ( It might be useful to change your hostname for the testing environment, or it might even be good to have 2 different hostnames - one for development, one for staging/prod.
