Venezuela's President Nicolas Maduro has ordered the creation of a new Ministry of Productivity to replace the Ministry of Science, Technology and Communications. In a video released on the official government's website, Maduro said the new ministry would be charged with spearheading a "revolutionary" programme to modernise the country's economy, including the opening of the country's agriculture sector to foreign investment. "This is a new stage in the Venezuelan economy," Maduro said at the launch of the new ministry. "We're going to start again.

From today on, the path to prosperity and national growth is going to be the greatest revolution, because we're going to give the country the leadership of the productive forces." Maduro also said that he wanted to eliminate "uneven" relations between public and private business under the previous administration. He said the previous Ministry of Science, Technology and Communication had prioritised the private sector at the expense of other sectors of the economy, including public administration. "Our main goal now is to end this historical mistake [of the previous government] by eliminating the sectors of unequal relations between the private and public sectors," Maduro said. He also announced that the first deputy minister of the new ministry would be Luis Motta Domínguez, the head of the Venezuelan Chamber of Commerce. The economic crisis in Venezuela has led to food shortages, hyperinflation and soaring crime rates. While the country has experienced a wave of food riots in recent years, Maduro has blamed shortages on an “economic war” waged by the opposition and foreign governments. Maduro has blamed Venezuela’s economic crisis on a US-led campaign to overthrow his government. Can you really print eBooks on a 3D printer? Absolutely.
