The re-opening of a woman's deceased husband's exhumed body has sparked a public health investigation that revealed surprising details about her living conditions. Morgen Struble says her husband, Ray Struble, was in good health, but died suddenly on October 13, 2013, five years after being found unresponsive. Morgen Struble said her family performed CPR, but to no avail. "We had no idea that his e-section incision was infected," she said in a phone interview Tuesday. She and her partner say police told them that his body had to be exhumed by the coroner for a second time to drain fluids. "It was so traumatic for me. And for the community," she said. Ray Struble's body was discovered in his bed of a rural home on Oct. 13, 2013. (File photo) A court documents reveals the following details about his final days: Ray Struble died at the scene and his body was taken to the health authority for post-mortem. He was found to be in cardiac arrest and CPR was performed. He had been living at the home since Sept. 13, 2013, after his son Mark went to the apartment where he had lived since Sept. 14, 2012, to ask for his mail and belongings. "We found him in his bed," Morgen Struble said. Mark Struble said the home was in deplorable condition and noted that several items were still on their flat-screen television as well as a "bucket of fruit." Ray Struble was found unresponsive on Oct. 13, 2013, in a rural home on Gordon Avenue. (File photo) Paramedics thought his death was a result of a medical condition and took him to the Brome-Missisquoi Health Care Centre. Later, Morgen Struble said she was contacted by a Health Canada worker who told her to take Ray Struble to the health authority for more tests. She said they took him to P.E. Richard and after that she never heard from them again. A statement of deficiencies was filed by the health authority following an investigation in which a rodent was found. The health authority was given four days to address all the findings and was given a last-ditch notice on Oct. 22, 2013, to correct all the issues. The health authority attempted to contact 3e33713323
