The challenge of a population-level approach to infectious disease research is the need to make decisions in real time. An obvious example is the need to make logistical decisions about when to share genetic data. To address this issue, during the emergence of the Zika virus in the Americas in 2015, we used a network-based approach to identify accession-level sampling sites based on their country of origin, and implemented a data policy that aligned this data with patient consent. What outcome would be most appropriate for your research? Samples that are suitable for the proposed analyses should be as uniform as possible in terms of age, gender and environment. In this way, a framework for the analysis is established and future replication becomes more straightforward. Is there some reason you wish to not have your data made publicly available? Our focus is on exploring new tools for analysis and so we are more concerned with the process than the outcome. My peers and I are in the process of analysing a single stool sample taken from a volunteer in Uganda with West Nile virus. I am very excited about this project, but I am concerned that the way we are presenting it is not 'open science'. We are not doing it in a timely manner, nor are we publishing the data openly -- more of a low effort/high reward for the researchers. We are in the process of obtaining ethical approval, and already want to publish it by the time the approval process is complete. But there is a question about whether or not we are pursuing science or personal research. We only want to publish it when it is complete, but we also have plans to share it with the community more broadly. What I would like to see is something like the Open Notebook Project, where my friends would be able to access my database on the
