The database design should be chosen based on the data usage. Our first attempt to get a decent audio recording was when I bought a class D amp, but the result was a lot of distortion, so I think I will buy a smaller amp with a different power supply and try again. I could try different values for PWM (little less than 0.5, big less than 0.5, 0.5), but 0.95 is where I could still hear it, so there is no substantial difference in volume at that setting. The difference between my BNC and the RCA is not as great as on a normal headphone, but here it is. So it seems that by just playing with the treble I can get a significant improvement. But the real question is, am I making any noise in the low frequencies? I would like to hear the difference, if any, between using a high quality RCA jack and using the top of the headphone's BNC. I would really like to be able to use the top jack, so I can extend my portable headphone with a Big Muff Pi. I think one difference between using the BNC and high-quality jack is that the former increases the noise in the low frequencies. The BNC is just a series resistor. It's a fixed resistance regardless of signal level. So if I increase the volume, it's the same resistance. I have no idea about the RCA jack though. Perhaps it's a different case? So I am getting to the point I need to use a balanced plug if I want to get high quality sound recording. I will keep the above settings, but I 0cc13bf012
