$r_{S_1} = -0.84$ Some representative data points are shown in [Table 2] with their respective regression values r_{S_1} . This suggests a negative correlation between K_{obs} and blood sugar in nondiabetic patients, which is in agreement with previously published results r_{S_2} . Our results are more difficult to interpret with diabetic patients due to the presence of other factors affecting drug metabolism. These could include the formation of deoxyglucuronide metabolites, which are often more pronounced in these patients. The known differences in the patterns of drug metabolism between diabetic and nondiabetic subjects also suggest that our in vitro results should be interpreted with caution. The in vitro glucuronidation rates of GM showed a positive correlation with K_m ($r_{S_1} = 0.84$ and $r_{S_2} = 0.88$) and a negative correlation with V_{max} ($r_{S_1} = -0.96$ and $r^* \sim 2 \sim -0.93$). These results are also consistent with previously published data [\[\[@B17\]\\]](#). The positive correlation is not surprising because it reflects a good predictive performance of the model. The fact that the three coefficients in this case are all negative may be due to the difficulties in interpreting the results for diabetic patients. For the analysis of CL with both covariates using a full model, an MM was chosen as the model optimization tool. In contrast, the mixed effects analysis showed that the physiological status (diabetic or nondiabetic) does not significantly affect the CL with respect to changes in $K^* \sim m^* \sim S$ and $V^* \sim \max$ of GM and CLZ.

CONCLUSIONS ===== In summary, the ADME processes investigated in this study were well characterized in vitro with the NM II(S,F) and the SMII models. It was shown that the stochastic analysis of the interaction between chemical and physiological information can enhance our understanding of the ADME and PK phenomena in a more systematic way. The authors are grateful to the two reviewers for their valuable suggestions. Professor Daniel F. Jones, Ph.D. of Keck School of Medicine, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, bff6bb2d33
