In automobiles, and other vehicles, various sensors are used to detect conditions such as tire pressure, tire temperature, and suspension travel, for example. In order for the vehicle to perform appropriate control of the various devices, and sensors, this information is typically communicated to a vehicle control system using various wired or wireless communication techniques. For example, in automotive applications a complex wiring harness including a number of individual wires can be utilized to transmit information from the various sensors and actuators to the control system.

When the vehicle has been manufactured and delivered to the customer, the wiring harnesses may need to be customized at a connection box on the vehicle to accommodate the particular configuration of the vehicle. In a high volume production environment, the wiring harnesses will be substantially identical with respect to individual wires and their interconnection. However, in a low volume production environment, each wiring harness will need to be uniquely configured to meet the requirements for the particular model of vehicle and customizations to the wiring harnesses can be required on an as-needed basis. In addition to the cost associated with the wiring harnesses, labor may also be required to connect the individual wires in the wiring harnesses to the sensors and actuators.

Further, when the vehicle is delivered to the customer, the data signals communicated from the sensors to the control system must be examined and tested in order to make sure that the wiring harnesses are functioning properly. Accordingly, the costs associated with the customizations of the wiring harnesses, the labor associated with connecting individual wires in the wiring harnesses, and the costs associated with testing the performance of the wiring harnesses are significant.
