We sat down with Football Manager creator Mikel Arteta to find out what this new technology means for the most popular football simulation game in the world. Interview by: Rob Conery

We are a new t.v. show. It's a mixture of the Paul Rudd-from-New-Inquiry bit and the totally unsympathetic TV muppets. Fox New Girl on New Girl — on a new network called Fox. The other networks have good shows, but New Girl has been gathering ratings gold. It's got a cult following, and maybe even a kind of "trendiness" that you don't see so often on these networks. We are partly unsympathetic to New Girl, because we know it is a wonderful show. It has a great cast, a really brilliant script, and it gets the balance just right: I don't find it sexist, but it has the edge of having a strong female protagonist in Jess. But we also understand that the audience is acting very strangely in terms of "TV watching" and following as a whole, and it's worth pointing out that the New Girl audience, which is predominantly male, is also the same crowd that keeps seeing the movie The Hangover. Fox We are delighted to go into this new territory, and we wanted to have "diverse" shows on network television. We don't want to be part of the yoke that doesn't let it happen. Also, Fox is part of a group of networks that didn't have much of a chance to make changes when it came to comedies. It's part of a larger entity that seems to have no skin in the comedy game whatsoever, and we want to change that. Fox We want to challenge the status quo, because we think comedy on networks is in a much different state than it was even a decade ago. At the same time, we don't want to be so extreme that we alienate the audience. We don't want to make it all "grunge" or "dystopia," either. The fact of the matter is, audiences are demanding a few things. They want a strong female lead. They want a television that isn't about sex and sleeping and partying. They want quality. The kind of comedy that we want to do, like Arrested Development, is the kind that has heart, but
