“The game has moved beyond physics to data,” said Karl-Joachim Watz, Senior Development Director at EA Sports. “It is more about how your player moves and transitions from tactical to technical execution. We’ve been working with expert performance analysts, biomechanists, statisticians and data scientists to collect and interpret the data from matches. We’ve done this for all 22 footballers on the pitch and each player responds differently, but in general, when a player is pressured, he is more likely to attack and not defend.” The Real Player Motion Capture Specification defines the way that EA Sports interprets the data and creates the visuals during gameplay. The EA Sports Player Performance Engine is used to drive all the artificial intelligence, animations, reactions, behaviours and on-screen facing of each player. “FIFA’s first data-driven game” The following frame examples show different elements of player behaviour and styles: An attacking player is pressing a defender and is able to create space, demonstrating a perfect understanding of his opponent’s positioning and strengths. A defender tries to force a turnover, but his movements become erratic. The player struggles to read the space and vision available to him as he goes through the motions of defending. These examples show how Motion Capture data can create in-game actions, or make an already-created action more realistic. The data from Player Motion Capture Technology and player movement is loaded into the Bio-Dynamics subsystem. This makes it possible to show the physical strength of the players and where they have been on the pitch, based on the player’s contributions, their actions and their movement style. This subsystem also creates new types of player behaviours and actions in gameplay, such as deep runs, which are essential to creating a more authentic, tactical style of play. The Ball Physics subsystem is used to create variations in ball movement and the pressures created by the defender and the goalkeeper. The on-ball actions and reactions are also well-represented, including close contests, handballs, aerial duels, and how long it takes to get on the ball and distribute to different areas of the pitch. "A new 'no-look pass' is also in the game," said Karl-Joachim Watz. "Every pass is now analysed for accuracy and where it comes from. The player
