The advent of cyclosporine and, in particular, the introduction of the compassionate-use protocol has ushered in a new era in lung transplantation. Survival is significantly greater than in the past; however, long-term morbidity remains high. The lung transplant patient is more comfortable than ever, but he/she is also at increased risk for both short- and long-term complications. Infection and rejection are the most common complications. Cytomegalovirus (CMV) is the major infectious complication. Newer anti-CMV therapies are being developed. Biopsy is the gold standard for diagnosing rejection. Steroid-resistant rejections may require treatment with additional immunosuppressive agents such as rabbit antithymocyte globulin or monoclonal antibodies. Cystic fibrosis, bronchiolitis obliterans, and bronchiolitis obliterans syndrome are chronic lung diseases that are progressive in most lung transplant recipients. A management approach that involves both medical therapies and aggressive surveillance and risk stratification is likely to be the most successful, as described for other solid organ transplants.
