The serial number does not work in Mac OS X 10.5.Q: Python: Difference between closed() and join() and how to implement this in my situation Could someone please explain to me the difference between closed() and join() in my situation? Because I am not really sure of what these functions do exactly (from what I understand from the documentation on both sites). I am following this tutorial. (Note: I changed the variables with my own in the code below to make my question clearer). import os import time def main(): time.sleep(3) os.remove('test.txt') for line in open('test.txt'): yield line yield 'line_closed' time.sleep(2) for line in main(): # Check if a non blocking read should be waited for if not line.closed: time.sleep(1) continue # print the line print(line) I understand that closed() return the status (true or false) of whether the file was already closed. When I call close() on the file, it doesn't seem to wait for the write to complete before continuing on (which is why I am using join() and not closed()). My question is: can I do the same operation, that is just make it wait before continuing on, with closed() or join()? A: In your example, you are removing the file test.txt after yielding the for loop. Therefore, the next yield will be right after the file is removed and hence yielding the last line 'line_closed'. It will not wait for the writer to finish and yield the line before continuing. closed() tells whether the file is closed and also tells whether it is safe to remove the file, which is what you are doing by using remove. Closed file are not changed in any way and not written to disk until they are
