The practice of resuscitating patients with severe sepsis with only crystalloid remains controversial. The present study examines the effect of complex (crystalloid plus colloid) versus simple (crystalloid alone) fluid resuscitation on coagulation in patients with severe sepsis. Forty patients with severe sepsis were randomly assigned to receive either crystalloid (placebo) or Ringer's acetate solution plus two units of blood (crystalloid) in a double-blind fashion for 72 h. Blood samples were drawn at 24 h to assess platelet and plasma fibrinogen, plasma fibrinopeptide A, antithrombin, and prothrombin fragments 1 + 2. No significant differences between the two groups were observed in plasma levels of platelets, fibrinogen, or antithrombin or plasma fibrinopeptide A, whereas plasma prothrombin fragments 1 + 2 levels were reduced in the crystalloid group from baseline to 24 h. Resuscitation with a simple crystalloid fluid program did not adversely affect coagulation in patients with severe sepsis. On the basis of these findings, consideration should be given to initiating aggressive fluid resuscitation with a simple crystalloid fluid program as part of the early resuscitation strategy in patients with severe sepsis.
