Follicular lymphoma: novel therapies for relapsed or refractory disease. The past 5 years have witnessed the development and approval of a number of new agents that have been demonstrated to have substantial activity in patients with relapsed or refractory follicular lymphoma. In general, the newly approved drugs have been introduced into clinical practice after other active agents have become available. Not surprisingly, new agents have demonstrated significantly greater efficacy as salvage therapy and in patients who have failed or are intolerant to other treatments than has been demonstrated in randomized clinical trials for the initial therapy of newly diagnosed patients. Similarly, the development of new therapeutic options for relapsed or refractory lymphoma seems appropriate, with the availability of available and reasonably welltolerated salvage therapy and with the probability of improved survival due to current advances in staging and risk-adapted stratification. However, selection of agents for salvage therapy should be guided by their potential to delay the need for other therapies and by the potential for toxicity and resistance. The remarkable response rate reported by some groups for temsirolimus as single agent therapy against relapsed or refractory follicular lymphoma has to be interpreted with caution, and further studies of this promising agent in previously treated patients are warranted.
