These dies are interconnected to one another through die-to-die vias, also referred to as "inter-die vias." There are currently two major approaches for interconnecting dies in a SIP. The first approach entails connecting die-to-die vias through the substrate to which the dies are mounted (e.g., a substrate-to-substrate approach). The second approach entails connecting the dies together through the backside of the dies, either on a single wafer or on multiple wafers that are stacked one on top of each other (e.g., a stack-on-wafer approach). For the substrate-to-substrate approach, metal interconnects are typically embedded in the substrate to connect between the dies. In the substrate-to-substrate approach, these embedded metal interconnects are exposed through the front side of the substrate in order to be connected to the metal interconnects in the other dies. However, as each die is generally connected to the next die, at least one chip and package are required for each die, resulting in a chip-and-package-by-chip and package-by-package approach. Therefore, the substrate-to-substrate approach is inefficient in terms of the number of chips and packages needed for a given system. For the stack-on-wafer approach, metal interconnects are typically embedded in the backside of the dies, which connect through the backside of the wafer to the metal interconnects in the other wafers of the stack. In the stack-on-wafer approach, only one chip and package are needed for each die, which requires fewer interconnects. Further, the stack-on-wafer approach is more flexible than the substrate-to-substrate approach because, in the stack-on-wafer approach, each die can be replaced with another die, while in the substrate-to-substrate approach, not only the substrate needs
