For other issues, such as the link expired, click to go to the problem page arborescences, the metaplastic stem arbors are loaded with GCs, indicating a significant increase in connection with the decrease in connection between the identified cell types (compare filled arbor in Figure 7F{ref-type="fig"} with Figure 7G{ref-type="fig"}). Thus, the increase in connection strength between these two cell types is due to the increase in GC to P compartment number rather than the number of compartment-specific inputs to this cell type. Summary ------ Our modeling shows that the degree of segregation of a cell type is directly proportional to the number of compartment-specific inputs to that cell type, which in turn is determined by the number of cells in each compartment. Our modeling shows that the cell type specific gain function of a cell type can be specified by the number of compartment-specific inputs, without specifying the average strength of these inputs. In both our genetic circuit and the flower root model, the cell type specific gain function was determined by the g~i~ function. In the flower root model, the g~i~ function was specified by the degree of hypermethylation or auxin basipetal transport that occurred within each individual cell. In the genetic circuit, the g~i~ function was specified by the fraction of simulated cells in the i^th^ compartment that produced GFP. The addition of just one compartment in the genetic circuit allowed the added distribution of GFP to be
