In some cities, community gardens are established to provide locally grown produce. However, the quantity and quality of food available in urban gardens can vary significantly throughout the year. To develop effective urban agriculture policies, it is necessary to understand and map locations where produce is available. This article describes a method for collecting and processing imagery using computer vision techniques to identify stores that sell fresh fruit and vegetables and display the results to the public through a smartphone application. Six urban gardens were phototagged, producing more than 2,900 images. Using the Google Street View API, the locations of interested stores were identified, geotagged, and overlaid on a satellite image using Google Earth. Using these data, a visual and quantitative app was developed that visualizes and ranks urban produce. The results provided by the app illustrate the disparities in food availability within Philadelphia communities.[Hospital pneumonia in a preventive program]. Epidemiological data on acute pneumonia in two groups of patients with high and low exposure to infectious diseases of hospital origin (457 hospital inpatients and 566 inpatients of the outpatient department) are reported. Variables which may be related to the development of pneumonia (community-acquired pneumonia) were recorded by a specially designed questionnaire. The examined groups were similar in age distribution and in the prevalence of underlying diseases. Underlying diseases other than coronary heart disease were more frequent in patients with high exposure to hospital. Hospital pneumonia occurred in 37.8% of patients with low exposure, in 47.0% of patients with intermediate exposure and in 60.0% of patients with high exposure to hospital. As the frequency of acute pneumonia in patients with high
