To avoid some of the issues that I've had in the past with code reviews, I've been trying to do reviews for code base that are larger than a few hundred LOC. However, I find that I get overwhelmed doing reviews with 50 LOC. What would your advice be? A: First, read Up For Review by Kent Beck to improve your coding skills. Then, write a review template that you use. Remember to write down what you did, why you did it, what part of the code looked good or bad, and the improvement you see. If you use Emacs, you can just M-x lexical-binding-mode and set it to git-style mode. Then you can create a file -.lexical-binding-file.md - and add all of your templates there. From then on, every time you save a buffer, it will open the template, and you can start typing. Just have a look at the themes in git-emacs-devel, and there might be something already prepared that would do the trick for you. You will also want to have it setup to record the changes you make. A: When I did a code review, I was fairly positive with the code, with a few places that could do with cleaning up. For that reason, I tended to focus on the less cleaned up areas, especially in the projects that hadn't been touched in a long while, but I didn't let it stop me from looking at the project as a whole. So in the specific area you want to focus on

The famous wordplay title question was asked by Jack Horner, an American chemist who won the Nobel Prize for Chemistry. Jack Horner's Wordplay. A: I think the answer is Sock. Although I don't understand the title of the question. The answer appears to be Socks. Explanation: There is no suitable clothing in which you can wear Socks if you can't wear these clothes. The following make more sense to me than the title question. If you can't wear these clothes, what clothes can you wear? A: It might be because you have to Socks With the clothes of slippers (and sandals) While the media and federal government continues to create hysteria over firearms in the wake of the Las Vegas shooting, the real terror is being perpetrated by anti-gun activists who are trying to make the Second Amendment disappear. It was not just Las Vegas that was attacked this past week. In California, the state government just passed a bill that will criminalize any form of AR-15 or other semi-automatic rifles for the foreseeable future. This and many other gun-bans in America today should be considered the greatest threat to the Second Amendment in a generation. The act itself is incredibly short and, for gun owners, can be summed up in the simplest terms: Make your firearm illegal, make your ammunition illegal, and ban virtually all semi-automatic weapons. That's it. In theory, there are a few other hoops to jump through and a mandatory waiting period for some firearms, but none of those can possibly be the reason that this bill has come into being. The best gun-ban advocates are on TV and have been for years, and one of their primary tools has been lies about the
