We used high-resolution fMRI to identify neural regions for processing of different kinds of visual stimuli in humans. Stimuli were movie clips composed of frames with 1-, 3-, 5-, 7-, or 9-degrees of rotation of bars, bars and crosses, or crosses alone. High vs. low repetition rate movie clips were viewed in blocks of 10 mins. During each session, we contrasted experimental conditions with passive viewing and then evaluated whether the stimulus conditions (rotation) differed from the baseline. In addition, we introduced two control conditions: (a) inter-cycle cross-correlations among the experimental conditions, and (b) a passive baseline condition, in which we asked subjects to close their eyes for about 10 min. The results in each experiment were compared to the results obtained from a separate block of subjects that viewed movie clips without any rotation; we refer to these as baseline movies. In these conditions, significant responses were found in the regions of the occipital pole, lateral occipital region (LOC), lateral occipitotemporal region (LOT) posterior to the LOC, and the lateral premotor region (LPM). The results were averaged over subjects and statistical significance at each voxel was evaluated to obtain t-values. A significant difference between baseline and each of the experimental conditions as well as between cross-correlation and the experimental conditions was observed in the lateral occipital region. This region showed a significant reduction in activity in response to stimuli with rotation when compared to the baseline. This is consistent with the view that visual stimulus rotation within the visual field is not processed by a mechanism that is different from our response
