it to you; all your evidence is incorrect. Q: Entity data being invalidated when layout is regenerated I'm having a strange issue with entities that I'm working on. There are two related entities in my app that are dependent on each other. When I add a new entity to the parent and then edit its related entity, the layout of the edit form will not be re-evaluated on save. It appears the code is just "known" to assume that the data is valid after adding the new entity because the edit form isn't being recalculated. This creates an issue with my app because when the user adds a new entity that has a dependency on another entity, it automatically becomes the parent entity in the system. I would think that this would mean that the form should be recalculated on save in an "autopopup" fashion since now the parent entity is a new record. However this is not the case. This is a large app so I can't show all of the code, but essentially there is a new entity that is dependent on the parent entity for its data, when the parent entity is created it creates a new child entity and saves the parent. This seems to go off without a hitch and the new entity is created and its data is saved. However, when the user makes any changes to the child entity, it will not save the data. The parent entity will throw a validation error because the child entity is in a state where it can't be saved. The problem is that when the parent entity is saved (with the new child entity saved as a result), it doesn't seem to trigger the autopopup of the layout. I'm not sure if this is a bug with the underlying data or c9d1549cdd

The Town Art Gallery holds a small, but historically correct collection of these stained-glass windows which were part of the eighteenth-century St. Mary Magdalen's Catholic church. Beyond pay-as-you-go tickets, the gallery also offers an Artist In Residence programme. ST. MARY MAGDALENE COLLEGE - MARY, DD ST. - THE ANNUNCIATION In 1664, when J. K. R. Chamberlaine was eight years old, his grandfather, Dr Hugh Chamberlaine, was the first Bishop of St. Neot. K.R. Chamberlaine, who is now 75, recalls how his paternal grandparents raised him at home: Mother and father not only provided me with the best education they possibly could, but they also loved me totally and unconditionally. They were spiritually blessed by their faith, and therefore they were unsurpassed guides, sources of wisdom and inspirations for me. From my earliest years, as a young child, I was in the presence of people who lived the Catholic faith according to Benedictine principles, the faith of Monseigneur Germain. The attitude and lifestyle of those who were closest to me - parents, grandfather, aunts, uncles and cousins - was very pious and influential on my values; I was a product of their character and values. I must confess that even when I was an adolescent, the home had a powerful influence over me. There was not an action or expression that was not tempered and cast through a religious lens. By the time K.R. Chamberlaine went to Eton, the atmosphere was changing in ways that parents could not control. THE MIDDLE SCENE 1983 Any passion for the Latin Mass died out at Eton. The example of the priests, all Church of Englandmen, was near enough: however, in this country it has been almost unheard of for a Catholic priest to teach in a school. For our Catholic parents the Latin Mass was an expression of their Catholicism. LATE CAVENDISH (C) 2000 - 2001 In the spring of 1991
