Videopad Video Editor 8.2 Pro Crack Plus Keygen Free is one of the best and famous - Q: Why is Java SwingDialogBuilder method setEnabled(boolean isEnabled) called in constructor? In Java when creating a dialog using Swing classes like JFrame and JDialog, the user is able to programatically disable the dialog by calling setEnabled() method from class constructor. e.g. :
final JDialog dialog = new JDialog(parent, true); dialog.setVisible(true); dialog.setEnabled(true); I am interested to know why the developer/designer chooses to do this. When I was learning Java I used to think the dialog should be disabled on it's own by default but when I learnt Swing I came to know that this can be done by calling setEnabled method from outside the dialog constructor. I would like to understand when to use it? Is it something like Java tries to call setEnabled() method when any dialog is created or it only happens when it is instantiated from a JFrame. A: It is because of accessibility as the user can control the accessibility of the dialog using the system settings. The way to do this is by calling setEnabled(boolean) on JDialog from your code. The way to make the dialog inaccessible is by using JOptionPane as mentioned in the JOptionPane javadoc.
