FDA-approved generic drug, manufactured by Pfizer, is commonly used for the treatment of high blood cholesterol (also known as hypercholesterolemia), as well as for anti-infective and cardiovascular diseases. Currently it is available as two available medications, a "generic" - atorvastatin, and a fixed-dose combination of two drugs - simvastatin+ezetimibe. A number of doctors and patients have complained about frequent side effects and allergic reactions related to use of atorvastatin, and a class-action lawsuit was filed against Pfizer in 2006. With a very similar chemical structure to lovastatin, the generic version of the medication is relatively "new to market" and offers an alternative that may be more suitable to many patients who use the medication and have experienced side effects. Cholesterol-lowering medications are sold all over the world, but in the United States and Canada, they are in the form of branded medications, and generic versions are not available. The same is true for Europe, Australia, and other countries. However, there are a few reputable companies that manufacture a generic version of the medication. It is a pill that works in a way that does not eliminate cholesterol. It allows the body to have normal cholesterol levels, but it prevents the body from overproducing cholesterol and underproducing HDL cholesterol. The free cholesterol in the blood is carried in a fluid-like structure called HDL, or high-density lipoprotein, which can be thought of as good cholesterol. Over the years, the more cholesterol that is in HDL, the less likely the person will be to develop heart disease. The generic version of the medication is available as a single, once-a-day pill. The manufacturer states that there is no need to follow a special diet or exercise regimen to take the medication and stay on it. (Gower Street; B2) It's been five years since Gurdip Pamecha left his job, and he still laughs about how he came up with his breakthrough video game: a quixotic puzzle to combine the programming languages C, PHP, HTML, CSS and JavaScript. "I made the game as an excuse to learn more and more about all the different languages," said Pamecha, who was hired as a software engineer at the BBC's User Experience Research Centre in Bristol. "I made the game and

This is the engine that will enable FileMaker scripts to be migrated into a truly Web Services approach. In order to execute the desired script, the utility will require the following information: The name of the source database, formatted in the following way: [SourceDB].[DBName].[SourceDB] The name of the target database, formatted in the following way: [TargetDB].[DBName].[TargetDB] The name of the function that will be called when the script is executed, formatted in the following way: [ScriptName].[FileName].[ScriptName] To create a user who will be granted Read and Write privileges over the database, one of the following steps will have to be followed: Customize the FileMaker package to allow only the user to launch scripts. Login with the setup of server-side FileMaker functionality. Step 3: Adding script and customizing the FileMaker package For security reasons, access to all the executable commands of FileMaker scripts will be restricted to administrators only. To change this status, find the Scripts subfolder and open the one that corresponds to the type of script that one is creating. Each script will have three files: the the collection of commands that will be stored in a database, the index file and the user directory. The first file indicates the database that will be used as the location for storing files. You will find the name of the database that has been created in the setup of FileMaker Server. For the purposes of this tutorial, it will be [TargetDB]. The next one will be the index file, which will indicate the name of the script being created. This file will be named in the following format: [SourceDB]. Finally, the user directory will be the name of the user that will execute the script. This directory will be stored in the user's home directory. To properly use this new script, users will need to follow these instructions: For the sake of this demo, we will be building a simple factory script that will retrieve the inventory information and display it in a table view. To execute a FileMaker script, users will need to access the FileMaker server utility. To do so, they will need to launch the FileMaker server package and create a new instance of the FileMaker Workflow database. As soon as the application is launched, users will need to
