And this is how they sound and look like. The problem is that I need to download these songs all manually. My question is there is any software or website that can help me do this automatically? I don't have any programming skills so please be as detailed as possible (I would learn it if needed). A: On the site you mention you have access to a dataset (a table containing the song title, artist, album etc.) that you can use for your purposes. If you browse through the data you may find something that will do what you want without the need to implement it yourself. Moreover, you can use the same dataset to easily fetch the YouTube video that you've mentioned in your question. This is done using an API that was developed for this very purpose. Here's the link to YouTube's Data API: And here's the JSON link where the dataset is located (feel free to use the JSON Viewer in your web browser to see how it is structured): By using this data you can create a YouTube scraper that would extract all the information you've mentioned in your question. And you may even save them to a local database. Our friend Justin Sisniega and the great Yuri Maiza are returning to MHTV after a year away from the show to show what they've been working on for us on. They'll be dropping any and everything that was worth while and turning those remaining pieces into whatever they do best. The first installment of VR Sports Vets will feature Justin's work and features the work of some of the best in the world of VR video. Justin has a knack for interesting, insightful, and entertaining editing which should lend itself well to this new venture. The first episode is scheduled to come out this summer. Look for more episodes if there's enough interest. FILED

A: The error, even in Spanish, suggests that there are 565 lines before the last line in your csv and not 4 (65536 lines before the last line). You could hack it with a process like this:

import csv
import sys
brute_force = set()
with open('output.csv', 'wb') as f:
    reader = csv.DictReader(sys.stdin, delimiter=',')
    for line in reader:
        if not line.startswith('"artist:'):
            if not line.strip():
                continue
            brute_force.add(line.split(':')[1].strip())
    with open('output2.csv', 'wb') as f:
        writer = csv.DictWriter(f, fieldnames=['title',
                                               'description'])
        writer.writerow({'title': line[0:13], 'description': brute_force})
    writer.writerows(reader)
Output: title
