Q: Who is it that's owed the credit for the copying of Martians? I was reading the story: "The Red Planet and the Martians" and I noticed that it's implied that humans invented weapons of mass destruction only to have humanity forced to retreat to Earth after the Martian invasion. On top of that, even if human ingenuity had lead to weapons of mass destruction it would have been the first time we had them, as they wouldn't have had any impact on the evolution of life and thus wouldn't have been passed down to future generations, implying that, if the Martians really did teach us how to build them, it was with specific intent and the Martians had their own motives for copying a superior race. My question is: Who is it that's owed the credit for the copying of Martians? A: It's the Martians themselves. From the article: We may have once exterminated the race. Now the red planet must tell its story. So this quote clearly implies that the Martians have had a culture for a very long time. I think more quotes would be needed to go further into their culture and how that mirrors
