Right now I'm in the process of planning for a fail over, but as I don't have the time right now to install a new SP Farm, is there any way that the existing application can continue to operate, process new alerts, contacts and whatever it does? Thanks A: Exchange 2013 is both a client and a server. If you are doing application development in this environment then you are best to use whatever the latest platform software is. If you are just looking at an "out of the box" solution, then you would be able to perform this without the need for customizing your environment, however you would have to do some fundamental changes to get a working solution. There are various articles on Office 365 here that can assist you. Create an app and assign it to a mailbox that is in the clustered environment, then perform a mailbox failover. You can use the out of band version of Exchange to be able to still provide new email to your users if the primary host server does not respond. A new neuropathologic model of dementia with lewy bodies (Dalí): a comparison of brain pathology in AβPP/PS1-dE9 and Tg2576 mice with and without E9. The AβPP/PS1-dE9 transgenic mouse model of Alzheimer disease (AD) develops amyloid plaques as early as 3 months, but it does not show cognitive deficits until 7 months. We examined whether the AβPP
