"Our data do not suggest that exposure to air pollution early in life is associated with lower cognitive functioning in older age," they write. The study analysed information on air pollution and cognitive function (in the form of two tests called the Mini-Mental State Examination (MMSE) and the Executive Clock Drawing Test (ECD)) from 190 healthy men and women aged 55-85 years old. These tests can help to measure people's mental functions, including memory, cognitive speed and visual processing. They looked at the associations between environmental levels of PM10 and PM2.5 (particles less than 10 and less than 2.5 micrometres, respectively, in diameter), NOx (nitrogen oxide) and SO2 (sulfur dioxide) and cognitive functioning as measured by these tests. As well as analysing concentrations at home addresses, they also looked at average concentrations over the previous year and over the previous two years, also at home addresses. They found that each ten-microgram per cubic metre increase in annual average concentration of PM10, PM2.5 and NO2 was associated with a small but statistically significant increase of 0.035 (0.023-0.050) points in the MM
