Erwinia amylovora is the causal agent of fire blight, a bacterial disease responsible for serious economic losses in major fruit crops. Genetic and biochemical studies have been limited because of the difficulty in obtaining strains of E. amylovora. However, the genetic and biochemical characteristics of one new strain of E. amylovora, HM06/4, were recently reported. In this work, we report the characterization of five new E. amylovora strains isolated in Madagascar. The isolates belonged to the 'atypical' pathotype. Strains characterized in this work were named HM05, HM07, HM08, HM09 and HM10. The genotypic characteristics of af5dca3d97
