Traditionally, the building, construction and production industries have focused on large scale operating companies. Although these companies each employ thousands of people, they are guided by and maintain an emphasis on buying entire business units (i.e. buildings, construction projects, etc.) rather than individual assets of various types. Although the building, construction and production industries have traditionally focused on large scale operating companies, the manufacturing industries have begun a trend towards outsourcing. This trend is apparent in terms of both large scale manufacturing and small scale manufacturing. Often, manufacturing companies contract with outside parties to develop and produce specialized equipment, raw materials, and/or finished goods. As a result, a large number of different companies or corporations will often be involved in a single project. These companies will typically perform their share of work under contracts that specify a set of performance criteria and associated timetables. These timetables generally include a beginning date and an ending date for the project. Typically, the contract that a manufacturing company signs with another outside party will include one or more of the following: A. The price the other party will pay for the manufacture of the product(s) to be supplied by the manufacturing company. B. The design of the product(s) to be supplied by the manufacturing company. C. The length of time the manufacturing company will be responsible for the manufacturing of the product(s). D. The methods that the other party will use to provide the product(s) to the manufacturing company. For example 6d1f23a050
